The Moon Rock Arthur J. Rees, 2015-10-31 The voice of the clergyman intoned the last sad hope of humanity the final prayer was said and the mourners turned away leaving Mrs Turolld to take her rest in a bleak Cornish churchyard among strangers far from the place of her birth and kindred The fact would not have troubled her if she had known In life she had been a nonentity in death she was not less At least she could now mix with her betters without reproach free in the all enveloping silence from the fear of betraying her humble origin Debrett's Peerage was unimportant in the grave breaches of social etiquette passed unnoticed there the wagging of malicious tongues was stopped by dust Her husband lingered at the grave side after the others had departed As he stood staring into the open grave regardless of a lurking grave digger waiting to fill it he looked like a man whose part in the drama of life was Care There was no hint of happiness in his long narrow face dull sunken eyes and bloodless compressed lips His expression was not that of one unable to tear himself away from the last glimpse of a loved wife fallen from his arms into the clutch of Death It was the gaze of one immersed in anxious thought The mourners who had just left the churchyard awaited him by a rude stone cross near the entrance to the church There were six four men a woman and a girl In the road close by stood the motor car which had brought them to the churchyard in the wake of the hearse glistening incongruously in the grey Cornish setting of moorland and sea
