

A Variety of Street Users

In most cities, streets constitute the largest percentage of public property, and this space must be equitably distributed between the needs of the many different users of urban streets. Designs that accommodate people walking, cycling, taking transit, enjoying public space, providing city services, doing business, or driving. This chapter identifies design elements and strategies to support safe and healthy space for the variety of people using urban streets.

Pedestrians

Pedestrians include people of all abilities and ages, sitting, walking, pushing, and rolling within urban streets. Designing for pedestrians means making streets accessible to the most vulnerable users. Design calls space with continuous, unobstructed sidewalks include street crossing, signage, building setbacks, design for human scale, and incorporate protection from adverse weather to ensure an enjoyable street experience.

Cyclists

Cyclists include people on bicycles, cycle rickshaws, and cargo bikes. Facilities should be safe, direct, intuitive, clearly delineated, and part of a coherent, connected network to encourage more people of all ages and confidence levels. Cycle racks that create an effective distance from traffic, are well coordinated with signal timing, and are incorporated in comprehensive design from the basis of a accessible and connected cycle network.

Transit Riders

Transit riders are people using collective transport such as rail, bus, or small collective vehicles. This sustainable mode of transportation dramatically increases the overall capacity and efficiency of the street. Dedicated space for transit supports convenient, reliable, and predictable service for riders. Accessible boarding areas provide safe and equitable use. The space dedicated to a transit network should be aligned with demand, meeting service needs without sacrificing streetscape quality.

Motorists

Motorists are people driving personal motor vehicles for on-demand, point-to-point transportation. This includes drivers of private cars, for hire vehicles, and commercial vans and those vehicles, trucks, and motorcycles must be designed to facilitate safe movement and manage interactions between motor vehicles, pedestrians, and cyclists.

Freight Operators and Service Providers

Freight operators and service providers are people driving vehicles that move goods or conduct other city services. These users benefit from dedicated route access and allocation of space for easy loading and unloading as well as dedicated routes and hours of operation. Emergency responders and cleaning vehicles need adequate space to operate, which must be accommodated while ensuring the safety of all other street users.

People Doing Business

People doing business include vendors, street entrepreneurs, and owners or workers at centers of commercial districts. These users provide important services that support vibrant, active, and engaging street environments. Adequate space should be allocated to these users. Provide regular cleaning maintenance schedules, power, and water to support commercial activity and improve the quality of life.
