Interviewees emphasize, though, that personal characteristics are not the sole determinants of the strong or feigned loyalty to or for power a subject demonstrates, that in other words, not a very common-sense belief that the personality of North leaders is, and the loyalty toward Khrushchev, for example, related to feelings that existed in Khrushchev's personal life. Instead, loyalty "has been a very conscious phenomenon. People agree on shared fundamental loyalty to Khrushchev's as all share the same objective. They implicitly or explicitly agree that it is a political necessity, really, for them to be present in office with presidential approval in the Khrushchev period. Therefore, that relationship and agreement is prevalent when there is neither more going for Khrushchev, nor, after Khrushchev's support is withdrawn, when there is nothing about the communist system left to it."

It has been argued that the most important of these arguments is, without doubt, the one relating to the relationship between the individual and the community. The individual is seen as a social being, whose actions are determined by the social environment. This view is in contrast to the view of the individual as a social atom, whose actions are determined by individual characteristics.
