Omnilingual H. Beam Piper, 2015-11-08 Martha Dane paused looking up at the purple tinged copper sky The wind had shifted since noon while she had been inside and the dust storm that was sweeping the high deserts to the east was now blowing out over Syrtis The sun magnified by the haze was a gorgeous magenta ball as large as the sun of Terra at which she could look directly Tonight some of that dust would come sifting down from the upper atmosphere to add another film to what had been burying the city for the last fifty thousand years The red loess lay over everything covering the streets and the open spaces of park and plaza hiding the small houses that had been crushed and pressed flat under it and the rubble that had come down from the tall buildings when roofs had caved in and walls had toppled outward Here where she stood the ancient streets were a hundred to a hundred and fifty feet below the surface the breach they had made in the wall of the building behind her had opened into the sixth story She could look down on the cluster of prefabricated huts and sheds on the brush grown flat that had been the waterfront when this place had been a seaport on the ocean that was now Syrtis Depression already the bright metal was thinly coated with red dust She thought again of what clearing this city would mean in terms of time and labor of people and supplies and equipment brought across fifty million miles of space They d have to use machinery there was no other way it could be done Bulldozers and power shovels and draglines they were fast but they were rough and indiscriminate She remembered the digs around Harappa and Mohenjo Daro in the Indus Valley and the careful patient native laborers the painstaking foremen the pickmen and spademen the long files of basketmen carrying away the earth Slow and primitive as the civilization whose ruins they were uncovering yes but she could count on the fingers of one hand the times one of her pickmen had damaged a valuable object in the ground If it hadn t been for the underpaid and uncomplaining native laborer archaeology would still be back where Wincklemann had found it But on Mars there was no native labor the last Martian had died five hundred centuries ago
