Panera Bread Company Marc L. Lipson, 2020 As 2007 drew to a close Panera Bread Company faced a new challenge To date it had relied on retained earnings and minor equity infusions to finance operations But a decline in margins would limit future financing from internally generated funds Complicating matters was the fact that its stock price was at a historic low and management was contemplating a large equity repurchase This case can be used to discuss multiperiod financial forecasts and the relative desirability of various financing sources A teaching note and instructor and student spreadsheets are available Excerpt UVA F 1575 Rev Dec 4 2019 Panera Bread Company As the end of 2007 drew near Panera Bread Company Panera was facing a brand new challenge Until recently strong margins had allowed Panera to finance its rapid growth largely through retained earnings and very minor equity infusions resulting from compensation programs The company used no permanent debt financing and in fact had allowed a 10 million credit facility to expire But now Panera was facing a decline in margins that would limit its ability to rely on internal funds With growth expected to continue and a 75 million stock repurchase under consideration the company realized it would almost surely need capital from external markets in both the short run and the long run History and Business Model Panera had its origins in another successful bread venture Au Bon Pain Co which was founded in 1981 The success of Au Bon Pain in the 1980s gave rise to the 1993 purchase of Saint Louis Bread Company a small bakery caf company located in St Louis By the end of 1999 the Saint Louis Bread Company concept was being expanded under the Panera Bread name Au Bon Pain had sold off all its units except Panera Bread and Au Bon Pain itself had adopted the Panera name
