Fruitfulness, Fecondite Emile Zola, 2015-12-29 I THAT morning in the little pavilion of Chantebled on the verge of the woods where they had now been installed for nearly a month Mathieu was making all haste in order that he might catch the seven o clock train which every day conveyed him from Janville to Paris It was already half past six and there were fully two thousand paces from the pavilion to Janville Afterwards came a railway journey of three quarters of an hour and another journey of at least equal duration through Paris from the Northern Railway terminus to the Boulevard de Grenelle He seldom reached his office at the factory before half past eight o clock He had just kissed the children Fortunately they were asleep otherwise they would have linked their arms about his neck laughed and kissed him being ever unwilling to let him go And as he hastily returned to the principal bedroom he found his wife Marianne in bed there but awake and sitting up She had risen a moment before in order to pull back a curtain and all the glow of that radiant May morning swept in throwing a flood of gay sunshine over the fresh and healthy beauty of her four and twenty years He who was three years the elder positively adored her You know my darling said he I must make haste for I fear I may miss the train and so manage as well as you can You still have thirty sous left haven t you She began to laugh looking charming with her bare arms and her loose flowing dark hair The ever recurring pecuniary worries of the household left her brave and joyous Yet she had been married at seventeen her husband at twenty and they already had to provide for four children
