Abstract: This study examined the effects of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised exercise program on the physical and psychological health of older adults with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD). The program was designed to improve physical fitness, reduce symptoms of COPD, and improve quality of life. The results showed that the program had a positive effect on physical fitness, with significant improvements in lung function, exercise tolerance, and physical activity levels. Additionally, the program had a positive effect on psychological health, with significant improvements in mood, self-esteem, and quality of life. The findings suggest that a supervised exercise program can be an effective intervention for older adults with COPD, and that such programs should be considered as a standard part of the management of this condition.
