Abstract

This paper extends the technique of evolutionary network design. We study an evolutionary network design strategy from the position of design style. A hypothesis under investigation is that the uncertainty of a total search space (the space of all possible network solutions) through evolutionary network design is removed faster if this space is partitioned into subspaces. This idea has been realized through a parallel window-based scanning of these subspaces. Such a window is determined by the parameters of a multi-level network architecture in a given design style. Our approach allows to synthesize networks with more than two hundred quaternary gates. Moreover, we show that information theoretical interpretation of the evolutionary process is useful, in particular, in partitioning of network space and measuring of fitness function. The experimental data with 6-input quaternary and 11-input binary benchmarks demonstrate the efficiency of our program, EvoDesign, and an improvement against the recently obtained results.

1 Introduction

There are different scenarios of network design in Computer Aided Design (CAD) systems, with respect to functions of CAD tools, levels of machine learning support, human-machine interface or, in general, regarding designer's role through the network design process. We solve the problem: generate multi-level logic networks automatically in different design styles. In contrast to recently developed algorithms, we study the properties that characterize flexibility of network design based on evolutionary paradigm.

The idea of evolutionary network design is very captivating and attractive, because the designer needs no special software to implement a given architecture and design style. These are provided by evolutionary (adaptively) search for the network solution, i.e., the designer becomes an expert. Unfortunately, this idea has been demonstrated on small networks only (2-6 bit multiplexers, 2-5 bit adders and multipliers, 2-bit decoder, 4-8-state machine, 3-bit counter) because of many difficulties [1], [6], [9], [11], [12]. A generalization of some aspects toward multiple-valued logic (MVL) networks is known too, for example [7]. More details on current work and trends in evolutionary circuit design can be found in
