How Aspose.Words works with fonts on different operating systems

What could possibly go wrong?

When working with documents, one way or another you have to use different fonts, styles and sizes.

Documents can contain any number of fonts and these are not necessarily only fonts that are installed in the operating system. Fonts can be completely different, taken from other operating systems, purchased or created by the users themselves.

Sometimes information about the used fonts is embedded in the document, eliminating display problems during document transfer.

How does Aspose.Words find the right font?

In case the required font cannot be found, how to find a good replacement?

Note: At the moment Aspose.Words supports OpenType and TrueType font formats.

Fonts on Windows systems

In most cases, while working in Windows environment, users don't face significant problems with missed fonts or incorrect layout.

Aspose.Words goes through a document and when it encounters a font's link it successfully fetches font's data from the system folder.

On Windows Aspose.Words takes all available fonts from `System.getenv("WINDIR")\fonts` folder first, then retrieves the additional fonts by their paths stored in the registry

`HKKEY_LOCAL_MACHINE\SOFTWARE\Microsoft\Windows NT\CurrentVersion\Fonts`

If a document contains embedded fonts, Aspose.Words can read their data from the document and use it to build up the document's layout.

But documents could contain links to fonts that are not in the system folders, then several scenarios come to play:

Users can set up new font sources via `FontSettings` class:

`FontSettings` class can be used to set the source font with the `FontSource` class.
