Abstract:

Finding viable solutions to complex problems in sustainability science requires efforts to understand relationships between societies and physical environments. Ecosystem models and social-ecological systems models for decision making can be improved by integrating informed citizen and practitioner expertise into model building. Participatory modeling is an integrative process for combining technical, scientific knowledge with perspectives and insights from resident experts familiar with the operation and function of a given system. The result is a kind of shared representation of a system's structure and dynamics. Here we discuss the merits of participatory modeling in the context of social-ecological systems, and outline key considerations for its implementation.
