

Abstract

[illegible]

Historians emphasize, though, that postwar liberalism was not an ideological consequence of the rising popularity of the New Deal. In 1945, for instance, a vibrant conservatism thrived at Harvard University, a very conservative Senate led the passage of Smith-Connally, and the Senate passed Richard Nixon's anti-communist legislation that resulted in McCarthyism. Donald Burtage, "The New Deal's End: How Liberals Self-Denied Themselves," Harvard Square 10 (March 1996): 10-11. Burtage argues that liberal intellectuals in the 1940s and 1950s often shared the same opinions. "They implicitly or explicitly agreed that it is preferable to have a healthy but liberal free press than a left-wing press with totalitarian sympathies," Burtage writes. "The liberal left's opposition to the New Deal was not a consequence of postwar liberalism, it was rather a consequence of the New Deal itself." Burtage, "The New Deal's End," 10-11.
