

psychology is too often dismissed as “edubabble” by one-size-fits-all innovations, whether corporately owned charter schools or curricula developed by testing companies to ensure test compliance and success. The dictum that assessment drives instruction has never been truer. The heavy reliance on metrics to determine federal funding has created a testing frenzy that drives local administration, determines instruction, restricts teachers to implementation rather than education, and reduces the infinite complexity and beauty of our children to numbers on a grid. The tragic flaw of the standards approach to improving American schools is not always the standards themselves, which are often laudable, commonsense goals, but that these goals are linked to expensive, high-stakes, standardized tests that narrow curriculum and marginalize the best teaching. When testing directions come with an explanation of how to respond to those children who will vomit during the test due to stress, it is clear that parents and educators must respond. To that end, I have tried to infuse this edition of After THE END with the spirit of teacher solidarity and integrity that I have experienced in schools and classrooms around the country. Real revision begins when we teach students to see new possibilities in their writing and in the world. So here is The Teacher Oath. Raise your right hand and repeat after me:

The Teacher Oath

I am a teacher, not an implementer.

My first responsibility is to the developmental needs of my students and their lifelong learning, not a standardized test or any other mandate that comes from outside my classroom.

I will therefore teach standards with passion, Creativity, and all my teacher craft and pedagogical wisdom. Like any professional, I will use only materials and methods that are useful to me in my pursuit of excellence.

You are allowed to tell me what to teach, but I will always determine how I teach it.
