It was the judgement of American in London (1992) that whilst teachers are increasingly asked to report on the progress of pupils it is hardly likely that they will change the target themselves. But instead they will implement the new curriculum without changing their targets. This is a failure to change a priority: what will be measured is important. In the literature that has looked at the impact of standards it is important to be aware of the measurement, not the standards. This suggests that governments that attempt to affect the curriculum by changing the measurement of what is being taught, is unlikely to succeed. It is important to know what is being measured and how it is being measured.

It is possible species overlap may be more characteristic within than across a host species. If the within-species overlap is greater than between species, suggesting interacting within-species species, then a phylogenetic approach by predators or parasites of their prey/hosts may be the most appropriate way to understand interspecific interactions. However, species may not have equal effects on the fitness of their prey/hosts, and differences may originate from host traits related to host behavior, abundance, availability, and/or characteristics of the environment, and species interactions.

It is important to note that the above-mentioned studies are not representative of the entire population of patients with bipolar disorder. The studies included in this review were limited to patients who had been diagnosed with bipolar disorder by a clinician and who were receiving treatment for the disorder. Therefore, the results of these studies may not be generalizable to all patients with bipolar disorder.

It is important to note that the results of this study are not generalizable to all countries. The study was conducted in a developing country, and the results may differ in other countries. The study also had some limitations, such as the small sample size and the lack of control group. Future research should address these limitations and investigate the effectiveness of the intervention in other countries.
