firmly to the side of the rocket-body case by a strip of gla which is painted on the surface, the tracer shooting in its stick socket as shown in figure 37.

ASSEMBLY BARR.

A band  $1\frac{1}{2}$  inches wide by 11 inches long of 30-pound Kraft paper is wrapped tightly around the rocket body and attached firmly to it, holding in place the tracer and stick socket as shown in figure 38.

MATCHES.

The match used for igniting the propelling charge in the rocket body consists of a piece of six-ply slow match cut 4 inches long which is introduced into the orifice of the clay-bottom loading of the rocket body in the following manner:

The smoke tracer which has been attached to the rocket body has a match extending some 2 or 4 inches beyond its lower edge. The match is bent over and the end threaded through the orifice in the clay loading of the rocket body. This match is held in place while the end of the slow match used to ignite the rocket is inserted into the orifice of the clay loading. The protruding end of the slow match is held side by side with the match running from the smoke tracer and a small staple is driven into the interior wall of the rocket case just above the clay loading. This staple holds the two matches in position, allowing a free end to the match last mentioned, which is looped and held in position until ready for use by means of a light drumhead. The match is protected by means of a small paper tube similar to that used as a protection for the match of the smoke tracer. This protecting tube encloses only a portion of the length of the match and protects the match from abrasion caused by the staple.
