

Romance Narrative, Feminine Ideals, and Developmental Detours for Young Mothers

Shanti Kulkarni

University of North Carolina at Charlotte

Ethnographic interviews with 30 young mothers examined the ways in which contextual factors affected the mothers' developmental passages. Themes associated with gendered influences from the larger culture emerged across the interviews, including intense feelings of love, stigmas associated with teenage motherhood, and social pressures to be with their children's fathers. Some mothers described challenging and letting go of romantic illusions and adopting more realistic appraisals of their partners and relationships. Because cultural filters influence adolescent mothers' perceptions and choices in significant ways, social workers must acknowledge and integrate these gendered influences to engage and intervene more effectively with adolescent mothers.

Social workers encounter adolescent mothers in a variety of practice settings, such as schools, social service agencies, welfare offices, and shelters. Within these settings, social work practice generally reflects prevailing societal goals that are related to preventing pregnancies (Berry, Shillington, Peak, & Hohman, 2000; Donnelly & Davis-Berman, 1994; Rothenberg & Weissman, 2002), improving parenting outcomes (Donnelly & Davis-Berman, 1994; Kissman, 1992; Rothenberg & Weissman, 2002; Waller, Brown, & Whittle, 1999), and increasing economic self-sufficiency through education and employment (Donnelly & Davis-Berman, 1994; Harris & Franklin, 2003; Lie & Moroney, 1992; Zippay, 1995). Given these far-reaching and overlapping goals, the best-practice models for this population acknowledge that adolescent mothers have multilayered and complex needs that are most effectively served by interventions that are both comprehensive and individualized (Benson, 2004; Rothenberg & Weissman, 2002).

Although adolescent pregnancies occur across socioeconomic and racial and/or ethnic categories, adolescent girls who are poor and of color are much more likely to have and keep their babies (Corcoran, 1998). Research has established how conditions of poverty and oppression clearly shape young mothers' experiences in terms of the wide range of stressors encountered (Larson, 2004), reliance on social networks (Bunting & McAuley, 2004; Thompson & Peebles-Wilkins, 1992), and overall life situation. Only recently have investigators begun to focus on the critical role that cultural stigmas and stereotypes play in adolescent mothers' lives (Bell Kaplan, 1997; Jennings, 2004; Rains, Davies, & McKinnon, 1998).

In this ethnographic study, which examined the lives of adolescent mothers, thematic content related to romance narratives and feminine ideals surfaced in many of the interviews. In these narratives, young mothers articulated themes that were associated with gendered influences from the larger culture, including intense feelings of falling and being in love, stigmas associated with teenage motherhood, and social pressures to remain in relationships with their children's fathers. Finally, some mothers described ultimately challenging and
