

on urban domestic gardens in developing countries (pp. 123–138), and the other by Ignatieva on the globalisation of ‘plant material’ (pp. 139–151). In reality, both of these papers are focused only on domestic gardens. Yet, these papers do make some contribution on the role of biodiversity within urban ecology. For example, Ignatieva completes her chapter by charging Western countries with the role of ‘offering a new vision to planting design that demonstrates ecological responsibility and integrity’. Chapters in other sections of the book also discuss biodiversity. For example, Rink and Herbst (p. 91) advocate that lands commonly termed ‘derelict land’, ‘brownfields’, ‘vacant land’, ‘neglected land’ or ‘abandoned land’ contribute to ‘urban wilderness’ and could play a role as an additional form of protected area that could be used to test new management approaches to conservation. One of the few occasions where non-human animals are given more than a passing mention is in the very informative chapter by Wu et al. on spatio-temporal patterns and ecological effects of urbanisation.

This edited book is an excellent volume on ‘human ecology’ within an urban setting: a book of ‘urban human ecology’. As such it makes a major contribution to this area of study. Nevertheless, as Alberti et al. [1] point out, typically ecological processes and human beings are studied as separate phenomena and, as such the interactions between the two within urban ecosystems are largely ignored. This book has clearly attempted to bridge this gap. While certainly excelling in the human domain, with informative chapters, for example, on ecological threats in Indian mega-cities, multi-scale flood risk assessment and ‘radical political ecology’ of water, the anthropocentric approach to biodiversity falls short of the mark means that this book falls short of the mark.
