

Peril or Prosperity? Mapping Worldviews of Global Environmental Change

The sun could well engulf the earth in about seven or eight billion years. "So what," you might shrug. "The extinction of earth, beyond the horizon of human time—ridiculous, not worth imagining." Yet some environmentalists believe that waves of smaller disasters—like climate change, deforestation, toxic pollution, and biodiversity loss—are already destroying the planet. Without doubt, many of the world's poorest people have already collided with their sun, dying from disease, starvation, war, and abuse. The beginning of the end, these environmentalists lament, is already upon us. We, as a species, are now beyond the earth's carrying capacity, a trend accelerating in the era of globalization. Unless we act immediately with resolve and sacrifice, in a mere hundred years or so, humanity itself will engulf the earth. The future is one of peril.

Many environmentalists rebel against such catastrophic visions. Yes, there are undeniable ecological problems—like the changing global climate, the pollution of rivers and lakes, and the collapse of some fish stocks—but some ecological disturbance is inevitable, and much is correctable through goodwill and cooperation. There is no crisis or looming crisis: to think so is to misread the history of human progress. This history shows the value of positive thinking, of relying on human ingenuity to overcome obstacles and create ever-greater freedom and wealth with which we can ensure a better natural environment. Globalization is merely the latest, though perhaps the most potent, engine of human progress. The future is one of prosperity.

Who is correct? Do the pessimists need antidepressants? Do the optimists need a stroll through a toxic waste dump in the developing world? Less flippantly, what is the middle ground between these two extremes? What are the causes and consequences of global environmental change?
