

Notan occurs when the negative space is sufficiently enclosed by the format to produce a shape that the eye and mind can grasp.

65 When pressure is applied to both ends of a straight line, it bounces up into a zigzag.

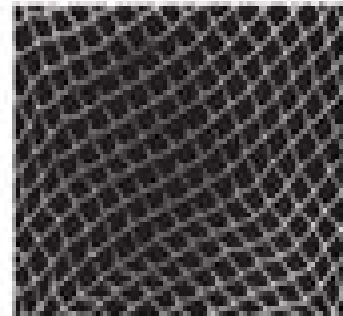

67 A straight line above the zigzag forces us to feel the up-and-down movement of the line.

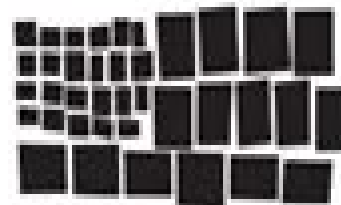

68 When the bottom part of the zigzag is filled in, it becomes a series of black triangles reaching up. When a line is placed above these points, we suddenly see a series of white triangles or points reaching down. The exchange is Notan.

69 We can see this design several ways: a series of white diamonds, white triangles, or black saw teeth about to reach. But if we see the bottom triangles as reflections of the upper, we immediately sense a white horizontal line running between them.

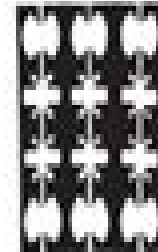

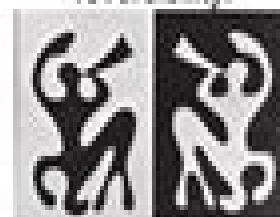

64 Is this not the white lines or cords are the positive or "real" while the black spaces are the negative or "dream?"

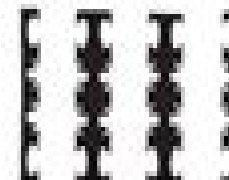

65 Here a kind of net pattern is made of the large two white spaces between black paper rectangles. The reverse of the net above.

A second criteria of Notan is its reversibility.

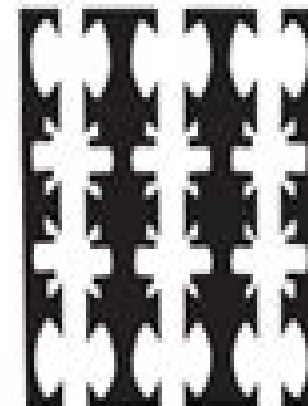

A third characteristic of Notan is that the shapes in the design have an exchange value.

66 This design is actually made up of black strips, but when placed close together, the effect is of three decorative white strips on a black background.

67 The black strips here are identical with those used in the illustration above, only now they have been placed so far apart that they seem isolated against a white background.

68 The spacing of the black strips depends upon making the white spaces equally strong and decorative as that, if we wish, we can see them as positive pattern.
