In this "Secret Blood Pledge," which is more than 100 years old, the author suggests that Americans need enough courage, spirit, and conviction to "stand with the British" in gathering support and information from prisoners. The captured French knew that they would soon be finally released, but the authors are thoroughly convinced that without a successful effort that great victory would be impossible. It is evident in the "Secret Blood Pledge" that the French (and Americans) of that time had a different spirit and conviction than we have today. They were more determined to stand for their cause, and they were more willing to sacrifice for it. They were more "patriotic" and more "patriotic" than we are today. They were more "patriotic" and more "patriotic" than we are today. They were more "patriotic" and more "patriotic" than we are today.
