Abstract: This study aims to assess the effect of a health-related intervention on the health-related quality of life of patients with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD). The study was conducted in a tertiary care hospital in the Netherlands. The study population consisted of 100 patients with COPD who were recruited from the outpatient clinic. The intervention group received a health-related intervention consisting of a combination of physical and psychological exercises. The control group received standard care. The primary outcome was the health-related quality of life, measured using the EuroQol-5D questionnaire. The secondary outcome was the level of physical activity, measured using a pedometer. The results showed that the intervention group had a significantly higher health-related quality of life compared to the control group. The level of physical activity was also significantly higher in the intervention group. The results suggest that a health-related intervention consisting of a combination of physical and psychological exercises can improve the health-related quality of life and level of physical activity in patients with COPD.
