Organizational Leaderships Impact On Emergent Behavior During Disaster Response And Recovery Operations

Tom Lansford, Jack Covarrubias, Justin Miller

Organizational Leadership's Impact on Emergent Behavior During Disaster Response and Recovery Operations Nancy Casper, 2011 Since the events of 9 11 and Hurricane Katrina emergency management has put great efforts into formalizing response and recovery structures following natural and man made disasters However these formalized structures are not often flexible enough to allow for the innovation that each different disaster may require to best meet the needs of the impacted citizens in the most effective and efficient way possible As emergency management continues to become more complex organizational leadership will be challenged to balance the need for standard operating procedures and policies against the ability to leverage emergent behavior that allows for innovation in addressing the specific problems brought on by each unique disaster This thesis focuses on identifying under what circumstances emergent behavior is desired within the context of emergency management and how organizational leadership can impact the factors that enhance or inhibit emergence during response and recovery operations Using participant observation methods over the course of many years of disaster leadership eight different incidents were analyzed for the identification of leadership themes that impacted emergent behavior As a result of these findings five themes emerged in which emergency management's organizational leadership can most effectively impact self organizing behavior within its ranks With an understanding of when emergence is desirable and by developing the capacity and an organizational culture that supports the vacillation between structure and innovation emergency management officials will be better able to lead effective responses to complex incidents

scenarios are notably pressure filled and require rapid decision making to bring about effective responses Natural disasters frequently unpredictable typically have a significant and dire impact on communities as well as on the organizational structures and systems that service these communities during the natural disasters The inherent ambiguity and uncertainty in dynamic and fluid situations require specific leadership skills for efficient operations and responses Specifically this dissertation examined the characteristics and abilities of leaders who positively influenced organizational effusiveness when preparing for the potential impact or and response to natural disasters A systematic review of the literature found that leaders of NSOs must understand the internal and external environments must adapt to them and must communicate broadly with stakeholders Leaders must exhibit constant and continuous environmental awareness and understanding in order to decode and analyze these inherently stress filled situations In addition NSO leaders who effectively managed the cyclical nature of the crises were better able to assess interpret and synthesize ambiguous information related to crises and provide a more effective organizational response A realist synthesis and configurative analysis of the primary research studies used as evidence showed that leaders must possess the fundamental competencies of decision making environmental awareness adaptability and information exchange and must further demonstrate those capabilities throughout each stage of the disaster life cycle response recovery mitigation and preparation Additionally competent leaders facilitated the process of organizational learning throughout the disaster life cycle in order to positively influence the next stage of the cycle with the goal of being better prepared to reduce further the impact of the next natural disaster Authentic Leadership in
