SUMERIAN AND BABYLONIAN CLAY TABLETS

Above, top: Sumerian clay tablet, c. 2100 B.C. A typical receipt for produce that is inscribed in cuneiform writing. The ancient Sumerians are credited with inventing the system of writing that recorded some of the earliest historical events. (Actual size approximately 38 mm.)

Above, bottom: Babylonian clay tablet, c. 2000 B.C., detailing the sale of sheep in an ancient transaction. (Actual size approximately 30 x 38 mm.)

SILVER SHEKEL OF BYBLOS

This silver shekel of Byblos under King Achramelek, 375–351 B.C., depicts a lion attacking a bull on the obverse, with the king's name in Phoenician letters above. A mythical hippocamp is shown on the reverse. The ancient city of Byblos was a major exporter of papyrus for the area, and the papyrus sold there was used for writing many documents, books, and holy works. In time, the word byblos came to mean book, and eventually it evolved into our word for the Holy Bible. (Actual size approximately 25 mm.)

It has been said that writing is the most important of all inventions. That premise is difficult to refute when one considers what the written word has meant to civilizations of all times throughout the world. Without some system of writing and accounting, we could never have grown into the complex society of today because communication and commerce depend on a method of recording that can be understood clearly and will endure as a permanent documentation of the many events and actions that have an impact upon our lives.

Prior to the invention of a system of recording important events, most societies relied upon oral traditions and those who could preserve specific details by committing them to memory. The information was then passed from one generation to the next, but often suffered from loss of details and accuracy.

There is evidence that some of the earliest forms of physical recording were the use of stones or pebbles that were scribed with simple lines or marks, probably to indicate the quantity of some commodity or a measure of time. Incised stones that have been dated to 8000 B.C. are thought to have been used to record a transaction that must have involved the number of livestock being traded or sold in some prehistoric transaction.
