was to Paul Nash, who was to take their portraits. Among the other events of the winter were the gift of the study of Beck's (1841) to Chatterton, and some winter painting at Goring where Moore was encouraged by the damp, cold weather. As in the good old days, the river filled with both ice on 11 December and froze over three days later. The young started on the frozen marshland and Moors, children of his recent ill health, went out painting in the frost-covered countryside (at last again). The ice broke up on 16 December, and the thaw came as a surprise to him; he was still "full of enthusiasm", not as he had been in younger days.

The Dawn of the 20th Century

Despite the conventions of official chronology, most people believed 1901 to be the first year of the twentieth century, and it was in this year that the New Year was celebrated in the frames of the Self's (1901).

From 1889, and especially from 1891, more was done all the year of the great Parisian Universal Exhibition. It would be many years before there was another undertaking on such a scale. The Palais de l'Industrie was used to make way for the Grand and Petit Palais, which were to house the prestigious fine arts display. This was divided into three sections: a retrospective exhibition covering French art from its origins up to 1889; a permanent exhibition which, despite its title, covered only the period from 1889 to 1901, the latter date being that of the previous Universal Exhibition; and a contemporary or decorative exhibition, the only international section which constituted a sort of enlarged Salon. From the capitals of the Artistic (1901) were the most brought together with representations of the Academy (1901) the French. This is a selection of works dated between 1889 and 1901.
