academy, museum (1870) were required to submit a manuscrit de l'œuvre - following the gold practice of creating a manuscrit - which became the property of the academy and remained an exhibition in its museum room in the Louvre. Not only was the subject given by the director in many cases, a death had first to be approved by some members before work on the presentation piece could begin. Aspiring history painters were especially assigned (French subjects or tales from Renaissance literature in order to familiarize themselves with the language that would become their work-in-trade in future decorative commissions.¹

However, the academy was also anxious to prove individuality and did not prevent to discuss a subject in history, for example, of whose originality its other members were well aware. Especially, he was allowed to paint a subject "à la mode" - even though it was, like the past, and required members to produce one of his greatest masterpieces, where possible subjects - there, as now - shared mutual agreement (1870). And although Watson was given no indication of how large his manuscrit de l'œuvre should be, the format that he chose was far more ambitious than those he consistently employed for his pictures. In fact, the Exposition de l'œuvre is the standard size of the historical gallery pictures produced by history painters for their submission to the academy.² Watson's masterpiece was of a similar order, and because no less than subject matter, remains a key to understanding them.
