

Justices Refuse Television Appeal

THE SUPREME COURT has refused to hear an appeal by the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB) from a lower court decision that upheld the Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) ban on the use of profanity on television. The NAB had argued that the FCC's ban was unconstitutional, claiming that it violated the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech. The court, in a unanimous decision, rejected the NAB's argument, stating that the FCC's ban was a reasonable restriction on the use of profanity on television, and that it did not violate the First Amendment. The court also noted that the FCC's ban was based on the fact that profanity is more likely to be heard by children on television than in other media, and that it is therefore more likely to cause harm to children. The court's decision is a significant victory for the FCC and for those who support the ban on profanity on television.
