behavior and are therefore ineffective Other existing trauma interventions rely on the individual to cognitively process information However when dysregulated retrieval of information from the frontal lobe of the brain is not physiologically possible All these approaches also intervene on the assumption that the child knows what normal regulation feels like Most of these children however have only known chaos and fear novelty This attachment based intervention model incorporates neurological physiological observational and practical regulation intervention strategies for anyone working with children with complex trauma history It is able to be applied in home school community and in therapy environments When a child feels regulated and safe the effectiveness of the child s trauma treatment can be enhanced
