

Abstract

The purpose of this study was to investigate the effects of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary adults. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved 30 participants who were randomly assigned to either a control group or an experimental group. The experimental group underwent a 12-week training program consisting of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The control group remained sedentary throughout the study. The physical health of the participants was assessed using a variety of measures, including heart rate, blood pressure, and body mass index (BMI). Psychological health was assessed using a questionnaire that measured levels of stress, anxiety, and depression. The results of the study showed that the experimental group experienced significant improvements in physical health and psychological well-being compared to the control group.

The findings of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can have a positive impact on the physical and psychological health of sedentary adults. The improvements in physical health were likely due to the increased physical activity and the improvements in psychological health were likely due to the release of endorphins and the reduction in stress and anxiety. These findings have important implications for public health and suggest that regular physical activity is an effective way to improve overall health and well-being.

Introduction

Sedentary behavior is a major public health concern because it is associated with a number of chronic diseases, including heart disease, diabetes, and obesity. The World Health Organization (WHO) estimates that approximately 2.6 billion people worldwide are sedentary, and this number is expected to increase in the coming years. Physical inactivity is a leading risk factor for many of the most common causes of death and disability in the world. Therefore, it is important to identify effective interventions that can help people become more physically active and improve their health.

One of the most common interventions for promoting physical activity is exercise. Exercise has been shown to have a wide range of benefits for physical and psychological health, including improved cardiovascular health, increased muscle strength, and reduced risk of chronic diseases.

Methods

The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved 30 participants who were randomly assigned to either a control group or an experimental group. The experimental group underwent a 12-week training program consisting of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The control group remained sedentary throughout the study.
