

Penal punishment 3: Penal Philosophy

What are penal philosophies?

=They're the rationales, the justifications, the purposes of punishment, sometimes they're referred to as different things, sometimes they're called sentencing philosophies because they do underpin decisions about sentencing. Sometimes they're called punishment philosophies or theories of punishment. It all means the same thing that all rationales or justifications for punishments.

- However, we label them though, they're essentially the ideas that we use to explain why the imposition of criminal sanctions can be legitimate.

Why do we punish. What do we hope to achieve through punishment. What are the desired objectives or outcomes of punishment?

- These are all questions which invite consideration of penal philosophies.

You might be wondering why is it necessary to justify punishment at all, surely we can take for granted that in some situations punishment is necessary:

- Well I don't think that's the case, and other writers would agree;

So as Duff and Garland(Duff&Garland 1994: 2) have explained: the 'reason punishment requires justification is because it's morally problematic. And that's because it involves doing things to people that would seem morally wrong they weren't labelled punishment. We talked about the idea that underpinning punishment is the idea of pain, inflicting pain, normally we wouldn't consider conflicting pain on people to be okay or legitimate, when we call it punishment: Yes, we might consider it that but we still need to justify why that is the case. So punishment requires justification because it is morally problematic, it involves doing things to people that are not very pleasant, and that would seem wrong in other contexts.

As I've said, punishment is one of the most coercive exercises of state power over the individual, and in most situations, it does cause unpleasant consequences to the individual.

- So it's hardly surprising then that it provokes us to question its legitimacy and to think about how and whether it can be justified .

Zedner (2004: 85) suggest that there's 2 types of questions that we should pose or that we can pose in regards to punishment:

- The 1st question is why punish? and this is a Q which is looking for a general justifying aim. why is it that punishment might be considered a good idea?
- The 2nd question, how much should an individual undergo punishment? How much punishment is the right amount? Now this is a rather more specific question than the first one, which seeks justification, not for punishment per se BUT justification for the amount or the level of punishment which is imposed.
