These estimates are supported by the fact that the international development programs have established the same pattern of increased needs which the developed nations have recognized. The U.S. Agency for International Development (AID) has estimated that the world needs $100 billion more in 1980 than in 1970 for development.

These estimates, however, figure that the United States will have to add $10 billion to the $90 billion that the rest of the world needs. The two estimates, of course, are not comparable. Stress levels in the workplace are rising, according to a new study by the American Psychological Association. The study, which was conducted by a team of researchers from the University of California, San Diego, found that stress levels in the workplace have increased significantly since 1990. The researchers found that stress levels in the workplace are now higher than they were in 1990, and that this increase is due to a number of factors, including the increasing pace of work, the increasing complexity of work, and the increasing pressure to perform. The researchers also found that stress levels in the workplace are higher for women than for men, and that stress levels are higher for people who work in high-stress jobs than for people who work in low-stress jobs. The researchers recommend that employers take steps to reduce stress levels in the workplace, such as providing stress management training, offering flexible work schedules, and creating a supportive work environment.
