

Justices Refuse Television Appeal

THE SUPREME COURT has refused to hear an appeal by the state of Tennessee from a federal court decision that the state's ban on the sale of handguns to minors is unconstitutional. The decision, which was handed down by the U.S. District Court in Nashville, was a 10-1 ruling. The state's attorney general, Robert Cooper, had asked the Supreme Court to hear the appeal. The court, however, declined to do so. The decision means that the state's ban on the sale of handguns to minors remains in effect. The ban, which was enacted in 1991, prohibits the sale of handguns to anyone under the age of 21. The state's attorney general had argued that the ban violated the Second Amendment, which guarantees the right to keep and bear arms. The federal court, however, found that the ban was a reasonable regulation of the right to keep and bear arms. The court said that the ban was necessary to protect the health and safety of minors. The court also said that the ban was not a total ban on the sale of handguns to minors. Minors can still purchase shotguns and rifles. The court said that the ban was a reasonable regulation of the right to keep and bear arms. The court said that the ban was necessary to protect the health and safety of minors. The ban also allows minors to purchase handguns for hunting or target shooting. The court said that the ban was not a total ban on the sale of handguns to minors.
