

Journalists see objectivity as a long-explored territory. It is a pretty emphatic for the past two centuries that no one can be truly objective. The so-called “Kantian revolution” in philosophy—against the old, theologically-based certainties and the Newtonian rationalism that had followed them in making universal truth-claims—insisted that we all must have a point of view of the world, if only because we can’t see all of it at once. That point of view is not separable from what we see and, therefore, what we think and say about it. There is no shame in not being objective, since nobody can be. But there is, or ought to be, shame in obstinately denying what must be true, or affirming what must be false, as so many in the media do with respect to their own objectivity. This is what leads to media

Kantian counter-argument never attempt to argue on content to rely among themselves except to deny them of bias—objectivity has years. This has now become the skeleton in the journalistic family closet of which no one must ever speak. Fortunately for those who would keep it hidden, the popular prejudice in favor of objectivity and the certainties of a rationally observable universe has remained largely untroubled by Kant, Einstein, or any more up-to-date criticisms—enough so to provide the media a necessary point of view of
