Special Pathology and Therapeutics of the Diseases of Domestic Animals Ferenc Hutyra, József Marek, 1926 Immunopathogenetic Aspects of Disease Induced by Helminth Parasites D. O. Freedman, 1997 Just as the magnitude of the growth and developmental problems attributable to human helminthiasis are being fully realized we are able for the first time to describe defined immune responses giving rise to the pathological lesions seen On the basis of the different sets of cytokines produced by CD4 T cells these responses can be classified according to the Th1 Th2 Th0 paradigm Deleterious inflammatory responses to metazoan parasites appear to be consistently associated with a highly polarized Th2 cytokine profile Thus host parasite models involving specific enteric and tissue helminths have provided seminal data on immunoregulatory and immunopathogenetic responses that are more broadly generalizable to the entire Th1 Th2 paradigm The first three articles in this volume present an overview of recent advances in the understanding of the induction of IgE eosinophilic and cytokine regulatory responses to helminthic infection Subsequent articles comprehensively review immunopathogenetic aspects of schistosomiasis hookworm infection echinococcosis lymphatic filariasis onchocerciasis toxocariasis and cysticercosis and at the same time emphasize key directions and priorities Conclusions from animal models of infection are set in the context of human disease wherever possible For all immunologists with an interest in cytokine biology and for those interested in the biology of tropical infectious diseases this volume is essential reading
