1990, 1991, 1992) is increasingly acknowledged as the dominant and virtually exclusive factor in the formation of nations in Latin America. The literature is now dominated by studies in which the structuralist perspective, linking economic development with political development, is being replaced by studies focusing on the role of elites, particularly military elites, in the formation of nations. Indeed, elites are seen as the primary factor in the formation of nations in Latin America (see, for example, Hartzel 1990, 1991, 1992).

However, it is important for the owner to understand that the system is not a magic bullet. It is a tool that can be used to improve the system, but it is not a substitute for good management. The system is only as good as the data that is entered into it. If the data is not accurate, the system will not be able to provide the correct information. Therefore, it is essential for the owner to ensure that the data is accurate and up-to-date.

Throughout these two seasons, grasshopper numbers were high. After an initial peak in mid-June, grasshopper densities decreased by August without any other distinct peaks, and resulted in lower total grasshopper populations in grasshopper years. However, Hurlbert (19) notes that in some years, late and mid-season grasshopper peaks may occur. For example, Hurlbert (19) notes that in 1981, grasshopper densities peaked in mid-June and again, in mid-July, and that grasshopper densities were high from June through August, and Hurlbert (19) also notes relatively similar densities in
