However little attention has been given to how relatives perceive patients with HNC pain and it is important to further elucidate this sparsely studied topic Knowledge about health related quality of life HR QoL in this patient group during early RT is limited and needs to be assessed in relation to diagnosis and treatment Self care SC refers to what patients do on their own to achieve maintain and promote optimal health and may help reduce pain for several pain conditions The impact of patient education and SC on pain and other common HNC symptoms need further clarification The aims of this thesis were to describe experiences and perceptions of pain in patients with HNC shortly after RT to describe how relatives perceived the patient's situation especially concerning pain and how they experienced their own situation to identify factors that impact HR QoL during early RT to develop effective pain management strategies maintain activities of daily living and promote HR QoL in patients with HNC undergoing RT using patient education and SC instruction In paper I patients with HNC described existential pain expressed as fear of death meaninglessness and guilt already during and shortly after RT Physical pain psychological distress and social withdrawal played a significant role Patients with HNC who were treated with RT should also proactively be offered treatment for the various dimensions of pain In paper II relatives described their mental stress in response to a challenging situation that required their active support to help ease the patient's difficult condition The interviews with relatives also revealed a lack of personal knowledge and frustration over the inability to participate in patient care as well as inadequate support from the healthcare system Early interventions from the healthcare system on behalf of the relatives may be necessary to meet these needs In Paper III regression models revealed that pain intensity and symptoms of depression adversely affected HR QoL in patients with HNC during early RT Customized prehabilitation programs aimed at preventing pain and symptoms of depression could help preserve good HR QoL Paper IV assessed individual patient education and SC initiatives that resulted in a tendency for lower pain intensity during a portion of RT One way to potentially enhance the benefits of education and SC could be to improve for example patient motivation and self efficacy as well as to optimize supportive efforts from caregivers In conclusion by identifying factors that can impact HR QoL and evaluating the effect of patient education and SC this thesis contributes to knowledge on perceived pain and the patient's situation during and shortly after RT in patients with HNC and their relatives This thesis points to the need for evaluation and further development of patient education and effective SC strategies for pain in patients with HNC undergoing RT as well as for development and evaluation of support strategies for patients with pain and their families during and after RT

Volume Eight provides a comprehensive survey of the state of the art in motion detection and correction in magnetic resonance imaging and magnetic resonance spectroscopy. The book describes the problem of correctly and consistently identifying and positioning the organ of interest and tracking it throughout the scan. The basic principles of how image artefacts arise because of position changes during scanning are described along with retrospective and prospective techniques for eliminating these artefacts including classical approaches and methods using machine learning. Internal navigator based approaches as well as external systems for estimating motion are also presented along with practical applications in each organ system and each MR modality covered. This book provides a technical basis for physicists and engineers to develop motion correction methods giving guidance to technologists and radiologists for incorporating these methods in patient examinations. Provides approaches for correcting scans prospectively and retrospectively. Shows how motion and secondary effects such as field changes manifest in MR scans as artifacts and subtle biases in quantitative research. Gives methods for measuring motion and associated field changes quantifying motion and judging the accuracy of the motion and field estimates.
