

The orthopaedic

assessment process for massage therapists

It is firstly important to understand the difference between assessment and diagnosis with respect to your role and scope of practice as a massage therapist.

What is an orthopaedic assessment?
"An assessment is an educated evaluation of a client's condition and physical basis for his/her symptoms in order to determine a course of treatment" (Clinical Massage Therapy: Rattray and Ludwig)

"A judgement about something based on an understanding of the situation" (Encarta World English Dictionary)

Assessment, diagnosis and working within your scope of practice Massage therapists use the Clinical assessment for massage therapists is usually divided into five areas, which you can remember by the acronym 'HOPRS'

● H - Health history questions (usually known as your case history or medical intake)

● O - Observations (i.e.: of posture)

● P - Palpation (of soft tissues including muscles and fascia)

● R - Range of motion testing

(of movements at joints)

● S - Special Orthopaedic Tests (specific tests that help us to identify problems more precisely)

Your skill set may also mean that you carry out other forms of assessment to help determine the nature of the problem; for example, the local or general listening techniques used in visceral manipulation; arcing used in cranial work or scanning the chakras for imbalances.

Depending on your skill, knowledge and scope of practice you may focus more on some areas of the above than others. However whether you are doing relaxation massage, sports massage, energy work or pregnancy massage, some form of assessment is vital. You always need to know why your client has come to you, what they are expecting from the treatment and a baseline for any changes you make.

Health history

"A good listener is not only popular everywhere, but after a while he knows something" (Wilson Mizner)

Taking a case history is often the first real contact you have with your client. This is the point where you can really start to hear your client's story, make a connection with them as a human being, and start your detective journey gathering clues as to their physical, emotional and spiritual make up. It is also the point where your client will start to make judgements about you; your level of skills and professionalism, and ultimately whether they will come back to you. Taking time to do a thorough case history is an investment not only in
