Markus Rathgeb

A colour system created by Aicher found an outlet in a series of posters to commemorate the fifty-fifth birthday of Göttingen. Aicher developed a concept for thirty-six posters, all in one, which were conceived not as collages, but as a much more complicated relay technique.

Among Aicher's best known work is his award-winning communication system for the Munich Olympics of 1972.

Aicher designed the headline "Munich 72" with a critical perspective on its meaning in 1972. It's unique spirit and character has ensured its place as one of the most widely used headlines around.

Aicher developed a visual identity for the 1972 Munich Olympics, a project that was the German Olympic about 100 kilometers away from Berlin, which caused a serious controversy during the 1960s. The visual identity project for the 1972 Munich Olympics was long delayed public response through politicians and artists. One of Aicher's controversial decisions was to reduce the palette representing the four seasons to the colors of the Olympic rings: black and white.
