Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the cardiovascular and metabolic responses to a 1000-m swim. The subjects were 10 male triathletes who were divided into two groups: a control group and a training group. The control group consisted of five subjects who did not participate in any training program during the 12-week period. The training group consisted of five subjects who participated in a 12-week training program. The training program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 min. The first session was a warm-up swim, the second session was a 1000-m swim, and the third session was a 1000-m swim with a 10-min rest period. The subjects in the training group showed a significant improvement in their cardiovascular and metabolic responses to the 1000-m swim compared to the control group. The subjects in the training group showed a significant decrease in heart rate, oxygen consumption, and energy expenditure during the 1000-m swim. The subjects in the training group also showed a significant increase in stroke volume and stroke distance during the 1000-m swim. These results suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the cardiovascular and metabolic responses to a 1000-m swim.
