

"How to Tell a True War Story" by Tim O'Brien is an emotionally heavy analysis of what it means to tell a "war story" intertwined with a story of O'Brien's own. He uses repetition throughout the piece in several forms; the story of Curt Lemon makes frequent appearances and the refrain of "A true war story..." or "In a true war story..." is repeated throughout at the beginning of each new section or theme. He also often calls back to details he's previously mentioned, such as the reference to Kiley's "dumb cooze" quote and the way it is referenced at the end of the piece. O'Brien tells the reader that a true war story is never moral, cannot be believed, never ends, does not generalize, is contradictory, has no point, and finally, is never really about war. As he goes through these sections and frames his own "war stories" and ones that he's heard from his friends through these perspectives, you get a real sense of the madness and inexplicable nature of war itself and the experiences that exist for each person within it. These stories could never be understood by someone who wasn't there because they are simply indescribable. They exist in a world of contradictions and the feeling of something being just on the tip of your tongue but you can't quite find it. I think that O'Brien does a remarkable job of making the reader empathize with the things he is talking about despite having no possible frame of reference for the horrors that those in war have gone through.

One quote that stood out to me in "War Story" was during after the first recounting of what happened to Curt Lemon. Before O'Brien tells you what literally happened to him, he describes the event from his perspective. He says that "when he died it was almost beautiful, the way the sunlight came around him and lifted him up and sucked him high into a tree full of moss and vines and white blossoms." We later learn that Lemon was blasted upwards by stepping on a trap, but the author remembers it as though the sun pulled him up into the trees itself. After this story, he says that "in any way story, but especially a true one, it's difficult to separate what happened from what seemed to happen. What seems to happen becomes its own happening and has to be told that way." I think this quote in particular is fascinating and opens a door to our early discussion about the definition of a memory and how easily the truth of a memory can be manipulated in our minds.

I found this piece in general a very difficult read because of how incredibly raw and real it felt, especially at certain parts. I am interested to hear everyone else's impressions of this and what they took away from it. Once again I have a more general topic I'd like to discuss than a specific question, but I'd like to explore the implications of this in relation to the manipulation of memory especially when dealing with trauma.
