star all information we wish to gain can reach us through two different channels their gravitational attraction and their light Gravitational interaction between our Earth and its celestial neighbours is however measurable only at distances of the order of the dimensions of our solar system and the only means of communication with the realm of the stars are their nimble footed photons reaching us with appropriate time lag across the intervening gaps of space As long as a star is single and emits constant light it does not constitute a very revealing source of information A spectrometry of its light can disclose to be sure the temperature colour or ionization of the star s semi transparent outer layers their chemical composition and prevalent pressure through Stark effect or magnetic field Zeeman effect it can disclose even some information about its absolute luminosity or rate of spin It cannot however tell us anything about what we should like to know most namely the mass or size i e density of the respective configuration its absolute dimensions or its internal structure The High School
