Abstract
The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was conducted in a community-based setting. The participants were 20 women, aged 45-65, who were sedentary and had no known medical conditions. They were randomly assigned to either a walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of walking for 30 minutes, 3 times per week, at a pace of 3-4 miles per hour. The control group was instructed to continue with their usual level of activity. Data were collected at baseline and at 12 weeks. The results showed that the walking program had a positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the participants. The walking program group showed significant improvements in walking distance, walking speed, and body mass index (BMI) compared to the control group. Additionally, the walking program group showed significant improvements in self-reported physical health, psychological health, and quality of life compared to the control group. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can have a positive effect on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.
