

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

By the end of this section, I should be able to answer these questions:

1. What are the five steps for a proper descent with scuba?
2. How do I descend with and without a reference?
3. When do I start equalizing when I descend? How often do I equalize?
4. What happens to my buoyancy as I descend and why?
5. How do I control my buoyancy as I descend?

Descents in Open Water

Five Point Descent

There are five steps you follow when you descend.

1. Confirm that your buddies are ready.
2. Orient yourselves to something at the surface or underwater, such as the boat or a landmark.
3. Switch from your snorkel to your regulator.

4. Check, and if necessary activate, your dive computer or timer. If in "sleep" mode, most dive computers self activate when you go underwater, but generally it's best to have them active.
5. Signal "descend" and, with your buddies, slowly deflate your BCD.

Descents With and Without a Reference

Descend slowly from the beginning. Keep your head above your feet to make equalizing easier and help you stay oriented, and stay close to your buddy.

You often have a line or slope as a descent reference. Usually, you use it as a visual reference only and control your descent rate by controlling your buoyancy. But, in some circumstances, you may use the reference to help control your descent or stay in place by holding on to it. The most common example is descending in contact with a mooring line to keep a current from carrying you away from the dive boat.

Sometimes, though, you have to descend without a reference. In this circumstance, stay with your buddy and control your descent by watching the depth on your computer (or a depth gauge) while adjusting your buoyancy.

When you're ready to descend, begin by confirming that your buddies are ready, too.

You often have a line or slope as a descent reference. Usually, you use it as a visual reference only and control your descent rate by controlling your buoyancy.
