

Conscientious objectors (often known as 'conchies') had to appear before local tribunals to explain why they refused to fight. (Most conchies joined up to do war work in the medical or support services. About 1500 conchies went to prison until the end of the war.)

Government control – DORA

In August 1914 the government passed the Defence of the Realm Act, usually known as DORA. The Act gave the government wide-ranging powers over the media, food production, industry and many other areas.

- The government took over the coal mines. Miners were not conscripted into the army and the government fixed profits and wages.
- Similar action was taken with the railways and with shipping.
- Early in 1915 it was clear that private enterprise was unable to supply the munitions the army needed. David Lloyd George became Minister of Munitions. He reorganised production and set up new state-run factories. By the end of the war the government controlled about 20,000 factories.

Food and rationing

- DORA also allowed the government to take control of food supplies. Britain did not suffer serious shortages before 1916, but food prices did rise dramatically (about 60 per cent). However, when the German U-boats began to attack shipping on a large scale the situation became serious.
- The government tried to increase food production by bringing all available land into production (3 million extra acres of land by 1918). There were also women workers in the Women's Land Army to help harvest the crops.
- However, this was not enough. Voluntary rationing schemes in 1916 and 1917 did not work so the government introduced compulsory rationing in 1918.
- Sugar, meat, butter, jam and margarine were all rationed. As a general rule, most people supported rationing because it was fair and kept prices under control.
- There was a black market in goods, but penalties under DORA were very severe.

Civilian casualties

Civilian casualties were very light in Britain compared to the military casualties. Nevertheless, about 1500 civilians were killed by enemy actions:

- In December 1914 German warships shelled towns in north-east England.
- In January 1915 giant Zeppelin airships began bombing raids on England. They made a total of 57 raids.
- In May 1917 German Gotha bombers began the first of 27 raids on British towns.

Propaganda

DORA allowed the government to control newspapers and other media during the war. There was censorship, particularly of the national press. The pacifist newspaper the Tribunal was shut down and the Socialist paper the Daily Herald was closely monitored. However, the general impression of historians is that British people and publishers largely supported the war effort.

- After the war, twelve newspaper owners were given knighthoods for their wartime services. Circulation of patriotic newspapers such as the Daily Express went up dramatically during the war.
- Leading authors – Rudyard Kipling, Thomas Hardy and H.G. Wells – all produced patriotic material for no fee. These were bought in their thousands.
- Propaganda was aimed directly at children through books, games and toys. This seems to have been the most effective type.
