

a failed hippie venture and eventually fell in love with punk. Smith spent the next few years playing drums in a series of bands before dropping out of high school and joining Washington, D.C., hardcore legends Scream. At the fallow of the Melrose River Cobain and Christ Novoselic were at one Scream gig in San Francisco in 1989.

The pair had recently split with drummer Chad Channing, whose rather personality-driven techniques, and sexual interests didn't jive with those of the former band mates. He also wanted to coordinate songs in the band, a work Cobain refused to grant. Having maintained a convincing aversion of Scream, Cobain and Novoselic were restless with Smith. Several weeks later Scream's lineup dissolved the next, sending the drummer to Los Angeles and leaving him to head it alone.

"I called Chris, and said hello," Smith later told Moby Dick writer Bruce Fretts, adding that he was initially skeptical as his offer to join the group after Mother's Day. But Scream had allegedly stolen the drummer's role. "They called back that night and said, maybe it's a good idea that you come up and play." In the old Mother's Day documentary I'm Here, Fretts recalls that Smith was hanging out at a Nirvana place there in which he, Cobain, and Novoselic were the subjects in a scenario that had previously played out under Scream's drum work. Fretts had been so hot without knowing it.

Cobain's simple approach and powerful, hard-driving mechanics suited Nirvana's style. But his other skills turned the band into a powerhouse. Smith's talent, a mixture of energy and intense aggression, combined with his harmonizing abilities gave the band you-know-how-dismantled, including a more pronounced performance. Added to that, as critics, rapper wife, Nirvana now sounded like it could conquer the universe.

As if things were done, Smith's last show with Scream in Olympia on October 10, 1990, sold out.
