

Knowledge Management Strategies for IT Success 2

- (i) Knowledge can provide strategic competitive advantage and therefore be successfully managed as an asset, meaning that such strategic knowledge can be used as a source of cost, revenue or risk reduction in most organisations. In some organisations, however, knowledge is not systematically managed and therefore is at best captured but lost.
- (ii) Knowledge alone is insufficient unless supported by other complementary organisational capabilities and processes, such as culture, structure, systems, processes, etc.
- (iii) Explicit knowledge is frequently identified as knowledge capabilities available to support the following (organisational) items:
 - (a) Shared product data (design)
 - (b) Shared product processes
 - (c) New product creation
 - (d) Shared best ideas
 - (e) Shared communications
 - (f) Shared organisational culture
 - (g) Shared paper records
- (iv) Organisational capabilities, including such as project management, risk, quality, processes, are used to deliver business strategic initiatives.
- (v) Success depends on the degree which organisations use project views of each of the following:
 - (a) Knowledge base
 - (b) Knowledge transfer
 - (c) Innovation
- (vi) Success is critical knowledge (explicit) information used properly and continuously across organisations within those contexts that focus on generating future, the organisations, all the ways up to communicating all information.
- (vii) Organisations have not properly capitalised on the all information subjects that, together with culture, best, used and progress, innovation and information have other major uses.
