

PEPPERED MOTTH INVESTIGATION

! Please report answers from different colour !

PART 1

The peppered moth (Biston betularia) has two colour variants: the common one (light grey-brown) and a rarer one (dark grey). The frequency of each type has changed over time due to natural selection. This is clearly shown in the graph showing the percentage of each type in the population of peppered moths in 1950 and 1990. The graph shows that the frequency of the dark type has increased over time.

In 1950, the frequency of the dark type was 10%. In 1990, the frequency of the dark type was 90%. This shows that the frequency of the dark type has increased over time. This is due to natural selection. The dark type is better adapted to its environment than the light type. This is because the dark type is better camouflaged than the light type. This means that the dark type is less likely to be eaten by predators. This means that the dark type has a higher chance of surviving and reproducing. This means that the frequency of the dark type has increased over time.
