

HOMEOSTASIS AND CELL TRANSPORT

Worksheet 8.10: Practice Questions

Read the passage below, which describes a homeostatic control system, and answer the questions that follow.

Cells regulate protein transport in and out of the nucleus in different ways. When protein levels in the nucleoplasm (the region inside the nucleus) differ from the levels in the cytosol (the region outside the nucleus), protein concentrations in both compartments fluctuate. These fluctuations may prompt the nuclear pore complex, or other macromolecular pores, to pass through the pores for that moment, to ease the concentration difference. The movement of these levels of molecules across the cell surface can be regulated by specific proteins, such as the mannose-6-phosphate receptor, as described in another passage.

In facilitated diffusion, a specific protein binds to a specific molecule at transporters, the surface this molecule binds to the carrier protein. The carrier protein changes shape. This affects the shape of the channel that molecule flows through. Facilitated transport is a type of transport that involves the flow of a molecule across the cell membrane. In this case, the carrier protein, the mannose-6-phosphate receptor, is a protein that binds to the mannose-6-phosphate molecule and carries it across the cell membrane. The carrier protein changes shape to release the molecule on the other side of the membrane.

Read the passage and answer your answer to the question provided.
