Nutrition Care for Children with Autism Spectrum Disorder Cynthia Banuelos (Graduate student), 2021 Abstract Nutrition related challenges are common among children with autism spectrum disorder ASD They include food selectivity sensory sensitivities gastrointestinal complications oral motor delays and nutrient deficiencies As the prevalence of nutrition related challenges increase in children with ASD it is important for a multidisciplinary team of medical professionals to be well versed in addressing pediatric nutrition for this population The purpose of this study was to investigate medical professionals' perceptions of barriers facilitators and the necessary qualifications to provide effective nutrition care for children on the autism spectrum Thematic analysis of semi-structured interviews with 21 medical professionals identified 3 key themes 1 barriers for providing effective nutrition care for children with ASD 2 facilitators for providing effective nutrition care for children with ASD 3 rationale for who is the most qualified medical professional to provide nutrition care for children with ASD Notably many medical professionals described not being able to deliver effective nutrition care services to children with ASD due to a lack of knowledge insufficient training time restraints and parental limitations Nevertheless medical professionals reported that simplifying medical jargon for parents referring out to appropriate medical professionals and the usage of a multidisciplinary team facilitated better opportunities for children with ASD to receive effective nutrition care services These findings indicate a need for increased opportunities for medical professionals to receive education and training on nutrition and autism to improve the quality of care for their patients and improve support for parents
