Famine in Western Europe

- Agricultural at the Brink: Around 1300, the agricultural improvements of the previous few centuries had reached their uppermost ability to sustain the greatly expanding population. Farmers were farming more marginal lands, yielding less crops. Plowing common lands for crops led to the killing off of livestock and less manure. And then the weather took a bad turn.
- Bad Weather: Around 1310, a series of cool and very rainy summers led to failed or very poor yields. Famine began in 1315 and lasted until 1322 in some parts of Europe. Starving peasants even resorted to cannibalism in some places. Those who didn't starve often succumbed from malnutrition or respiratory or intestinal diseases.
