NEW LANCHESTER STRATEGY

SALES AND MARKETING STRATEGY FOR THE WEAK

The Lanchester Strategy model equation shows that you lose a battle when the enemy's strength is three times yours. Even the most skilled swordsman can't win if attacked by three opponents at once.

They use their high share as an excuse to put pressure on their clients. This is a good chance for us to step in.

Well, at least they don't know about our local battles.

laws were originally presented as laws of combat but in Japan they have been adapted into laws of competition. If one applies Lanchester's laws to business strategy, previously vague aspects of running a business become clearer so it becomes easy to apply them to actual business situations. When these laws are applied to business, the following things become clarified: First is the relationship between market share and profitability. Second, distinctions can be made between the strategy of the strong that can be implemented by the company fulfilling the conditions necessary to become top ranked and the strategy of the weak that must be implemented by those including the second ranked company that have failed to meet those conditions. Third, specific weightings can be assigned to products, their marketing strategies and tactics, and other such important factors and attendant procedures comprising a business. I believe that these ideas, which until now seem to have escaped the attention of guru consultants in the United Kingdom and the United States, constitute a novel approach.
