

Who Must Keep OSHA Records

All employers must report to OSHA any workplace incident that results in a fatality or the hospitalization of three or more employees. These incidents must be reported within eight hours of their occurrence.

Most employers are required to keep additional injury and illness records on an ongoing basis for OSHA compliance. There are two major exceptions:

Size

If your company had two or fewer employees at all times during the last calendar year, you do not need to keep OSHA injury and illness records unless OSHA or the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) informs you in writing that you must keep records. When looking up the number of employees, count the number of employees in the company on a daily, not at each individual worksite.

Industry

If your company is classified in one of the low-hazard industries listed in the OSHA table on the back of this reference card, you do not need to keep OSHA injury and illness records unless OSHA, the BLS, or a state agency operating under the authority of OSHA or the BLS asks you to. This exemption applies to individual business establishments. For example, if a company has several business establishments engaged in different activities, some of the company's establishments may be required to keep records while others may be exempt.

TIP:

Even if you are exempt from OSHA recordkeeping requirements, you are still required to display the official Department of Labor OSHA poster. This poster explains to employees that they are entitled to a workplace free from recognized hazards and how to report workplace hazards.

What Must Be Recorded

After you have determined that you are covered by OSHA recordkeeping requirements, you need to know what types of injuries and illnesses you must record. Not all work-related injuries and illnesses have to be recorded.

General employers must record each injury and illness that:

1. Is work related
2. Is a new case
3. Meets one or more of the general recording criteria established in the OSHA rules

The following flow chart provides a helpful guide to decide whether an event requires recording.

Step #1

Did the employee experience an injury or illness?

NO

Do not record the injury or illness

YES

Step #2

Is the injury or illness work-related?

NO

Do not record the injury or illness

YES

Step #3

Is the injury or illness a new case?

NO

Update the previously recorded injury or illness entry, if necessary

YES

Step #4

Does the injury or illness meet the general recording criteria or the application to specific cases?

NO

Do not record the injury or illness

YES

Record the Injury or Illness

Step #1: Did the Employee Experience an Injury or Illness?

OSHA defines an injury as any wound or damage to the body resulting from an event in the work environment. Injuries include things such as a cut, laceration, or sprain. It also includes an amputation, laceration, bruise or clipped tooth. Illnesses include both acute and chronic illnesses, such as skin diseases, respiratory disorders, poisoning or hearing loss. You must also record all nonfatal injuries (those are wounds caused by needles) or cuts from a sharp object that are contaminated with another person's blood or other potentially infectious material. The term "infectious materials" is defined in OSHA's Bloodborne Pathogens standard and includes things like human bodily fluids, tissues and organs.

If you are uncertain about whether an injury or illness occurred, you can refer an employee to a physician or other health care professional for evaluation and may consider the health care professional's opinion in determining whether an injury or illness exists. Ultimately, it is your responsibility to determine whether an injury or illness occurred and whether it is recordable or not.

Step #2: Is the Injury or Illness Work-Related?

OSHA states that you must consider an injury or illness to be work-related if the work environment caused or contributed to the condition, or significantly aggravated a pre-existing injury or illness.

OSHA defines the work environment as the establishment and other locations where one or more employees are working or present as a condition of employment. The work environment includes not only physical locations, but also the equipment or materials used by employees during the course of their work. Work-relatedness is usually presumed by OSHA for injuries and illnesses resulting from events or exposures occurring in the workplace, unless an exception specifically applies.

There are nine exceptions to work-relatedness. The OSHA rules state that an injury or illness occurring at work that falls under one of the following exceptions is not work-related and does not need to be recorded.

1. At the time of the injury or illness, the employee was present in the work environment as a member of the general public rather than as an employee.
